"STILL"

In the writing of this song, the love that transcends all others, a mother's, and grief at the loss of her child, are striving for utterance.

The world is filled with mothers to whom it will always be "still" whether the tender feet have toddled into the dawn of the great To-morrow, or are treading the highways of To-day. It may be years since a little cut finger, or bruised knee, have been trustingly held up to be cured with a kiss. Success or failure, honor or disgrace, may have befallen; but to the mother-soul every rustling leaf will vibrate with a nestling presence; every bird will twitter of the day when her arms were not empty. In every shaft of flickering sunshine, she will see again her baby's smile.

Mother's form may be bent, her face withered, but there are no furrows in the time-mellowed heart. A broken toy, just a pencil bearing the imprint of tiny teeth; will possess more value in her sight than all the wealth of Golconda.

Estimate the drops in the Ocean, count the grains of sand on its beach; but fathom not the depth and sanctity of a mother's affection, which may be likened only to the love of the One who said, "Let the little ones come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven," and of which it is a divine reflection.
